Adventure in a New Orleans Swamp. A singular-incident befell a valiant Nimrod charges and take them away. the other day which will be likely to effect a radical cure of his sporting propensities for at least the current season if no longer. More penetrated some distance into the depths of the heavy swamp beyond the Metarie Ridge, which sonable prices for grain, lumber, and provisions of all runs along behind the city, by walking along on the trunks of fallen trees, and when essaying to return he found his passage barred in an extraordinary manner, for right in a deep pool, on the surface of which rested a long log over which he had passed, he found collected some four or five large sized alligators, which, with the well known cunning of their kind, had doubtless gathered there to stop his exit, and to sweep him from the log with their ponderous tails, should he attempt to cross it. He had no idea of doing this, though, for with a cold sweat on his brow, and hair like quills of the fretful porcupine, he sprang back and scrambled into a convenient gum tree which fortunately spread | DESPECTFULLY inits low branches over the butt of the log. From this safe elevation he blazed away at the hungry amphibii with his bird shot until his bag | Combs at his residence, was emptied, and doing little damage as they one block south of hid amid the undergrowth. But he durst not come down, having a very shrewd suspicion that his persecutors had not gone far, an opinion which was confirmed when a huge "bull 'gaitor," encouraged by the approach of night began to bellow like the bulls of Bashan in fierce anticipation of the good time coming, when he fancied he should sup luxuriously on the flesh of a Christian. Seeing the phase which the affair had assumed the treed sportsman came to the conclusion that he might as well exercise his lungs some, too, and began to shout most manfully in both French and English, for he was one of the creole sort. He was soon replied to and eventually approached and taken off by a couple of those men who earn a difficult livelihood by cutting wood in the swamp, and bringing it out in the little flat bottomed skiffs or punts with which they navigate the little Christmas and New Year's. winding bayous which thread the muddy wilderness in every direction. - [Cor.
